How Restaurants Can “Deliver” on Revenue During Times of Inflation
We know too well inflation has made its way into our lives. Many of us are looking for spare change where we can find it. We’re also looking for good news.

And guess what?

We have some!

Imagine the feeling of sitting down with your favorite meal. If we do say so ourselves, this news is just as good (well, almost as good) for restaurants.
We surveyed consumers across the globe to understand their attitudes toward takeout and food deliveries during this time of economic change, and the results show people are saying yes to treating themselves to food-to-go now more than they did before inflation began to rise.

As consumer appetite for delivery and takeout - quite literally - grows, so does the opportunity for restaurants.

So what does the research mean for today’s takeout and delivery trends? Here we’ll unpack:

• Consumer preferences & habits
• Key purchasing considerations
• How to improve the customer experience, streamline operations & improve profits

Let’s dig in!
People have grown to know and love the convenience of delivery. This habit formed through the pandemic and it’s stuck. People continue to crave small ways to treat themselves, even as they watch their wallets.

An interesting finding ... though we’re not surprised. Why?

Well, 57% of people globally get up to three food deliveries a week. That’s 8% more than pre-inflation habits.

People have grown to know and love the convenience of delivery. This habit formed through the pandemic and it’s stuck. People continue to crave small ways to treat themselves, even as they watch their wallets.
But when are deliveries most popular?

31% of people are ordering on a weekend evening with friends and family.

That’s nearly 2x more than people ordering on a weekday with their crew.

And both of these times trump other options like ordering on a weekend evening alone or during a weekday lunch break at work.

“Working with Deliverect has been great for Chipotle’s business. It’s allowed us to add the additional delivery partners that we wanted to and increased the number of transactions that we are able to process,” said Andrew Lawrence, Chipotle IT Manager UK & Europe.

“This means we can continue getting our food in the hands of happy customers, especially when deliveries are at an all-time high.”

Treating customers to top notch experiences in and out of the restaurant will be key to a restaurant’s success.
While people are getting more takeout and deliveries, they are also being more selective.

Over two thirds (67%) of people said quality ingredients are more important now than before the rise of inflation, as is the taste of food (69%).

What’s more, convenience is a major deciding factor for consumers selecting a restaurant for takeout and delivery.

62% claim how close a restaurant is and how fast their food can get to them is now more important than ever.

The growing need for convenience has been around for a while. In 2021, McKinsey reported on the rapid evolution of food delivery and found convenience as one of the leading pandemic trends - and that’s clearly not changing anytime soon.

“Is that all that consumers look for when selecting a restaurant? Well, no.”
There are just a few other factors that influence why consumers choose one over another.

No matter the location, delivery is the thing people can’t let go, with consumers likely to cut back on other activities such as:

- 44% Buying clothing
- 43% Traveling

“People are continuing to prioritize and enjoy takeout and delivery food orders as a more cost effective way to enjoy themselves during this time. But with consumers more selective on where they put their money, convenience, ease and a variety of menu offerings are the secret sauce to restaurant success.”

- Zhong Xu, Deliverect CEO and Co-founder

Online orders. Simplified.
So you’ve successfully driven customers to order from your fine establishment. But how do you ensure they come back?

Let’s get the sticky stuff out of the way first.

43%

According to our research, nearly half (43%) of customers didn’t order from a restaurant again after they had a bad delivery experience.

26%

To boot, 26% of those same people told their friends or family not to buy from the restaurant either.

Okay, rewind. What kind of frustrations do customers have?

‘Overpriced’ menu items didn’t appear in the top 5 list of frustrations - reinforcing that people are willing to pay more for high-quality food. But being quick, reliable and conveniently located really does reign supreme, with ‘long delivery’ and ‘incorrect orders’ coming out on top as the most likely to get under peoples’ skins.

“We are talking about 100% fewer errors in capturing our orders because they are already integrated directly into our system. And additionally, this has allowed us to save between 2 and 3 mins on the entire delivery process.”
- Bernardo Lastra, Marketing Director of Hooters Mexico

That leads us to maximum wait time for deliveries. Here are consumers’ expectations:

Now that’s out of the way, let’s look at what would actually make people more likely to order food delivery from a restaurant again.

Two guesses as to what were among the top results...

- Quality food
  Is key with a staggering 52% saying it keeps them coming back. What about convenience, you ask?

- Fast delivery
  Was right up there with 41% saying this was the most important element.
The proof is in the pudding. People like the convenience of food-to-go, and restaurants that place as much care and attention into their delivery experience as they do their dine-in experience will attract more customers and boost profits. The details matter. Surprise and delight customers with a message on their takeout bag. Consider creating personalized promotions to build loyalty. Add something a little extra to your regulars’ orders.

With the right technology, you can find time to think of new ways to connect with your customers. Strive For Consistent Reliability

Overall reliability, from accessibility to prep to delivery, is not only important to you and your business but its trickling effect has an impact on your customers’ experience. Those that prioritize visibility, efficiency and accuracy at every step are rewarded with repeat customers and glowing reviews.

For inside the kitchen, incorporate an intuitive kitchen display to triage tasks by workstations and eliminate physical tickets.

For outside the kitchen, diversify your delivery channels so a customer can find, contact and order from you easily and efficiently. If they can’t, they’ll find another restaurant that is more convenient.

Looking to add another channel and control the delivery experience? Set up your own personalized Online Ordering website so customers can order directly from your online storefront.
Figuring out your next move as a business can be daunting without clear and precise data. Which menus bring in the most profit? Which products are selling out faster? When are your peak hours? This is all important information to have to adapt to socioeconomic trends and to understand your regulars and new customers.

Technology should be simple. Restaurants should be able to quickly leverage order and revenue data to make data-backed decisions on menus and promotions across multiple channels. For instance, data may show that it would be valuable to shrink your menu. A smaller menu that really fits with what your customers want to order means you can reduce costs and focus on quality.

Creating visual reports on sales performance has never been easier with our intuitive Insights tool. Once you’ve figured out your next big move, modify your menus and channels in just a few clicks—it’s a piece of cake.
